Small businesses in Western North Carolina can apply for a new $2.5 million grant from Lowe's between Nov. 18 and Nov. 22, with 100 recipients set to receive $20,000 each to aid economic recovery. The Lowe's Foundation is investing $50 million over five years to train 50,000 people in skilled trades careers through grants to community colleges and nonprofits. A lack of skilled workers is a critical issue facing the US economy, with 85% of contractors reporting trouble finding qualified workers. Many young people dream of entering stable careers in skilled trades like electrical work, plumbing, HVAC repair, construction, appliance fixing, and carpentry. There are millions of students enrolled in associate-degree programs that can help them achieve this goal. The Lowe's Foundation is dedicated to supporting these efforts by providing grants to community colleges and non-profit organizations that offer innovative training programs for adults. The foundation will have two annual grant cycles. The first one focuses on community and technical colleges, and the application process starts today. The deadline to apply is April 10, 2023. For those interested in applying, informational webinars will be held on March 9 and 22. To register or learn more about the grants, visit Lowes.com/Foundation. The Lowe's Foundation aims to develop a community of skilled tradespeople by investing $50 million from 2023 to 2027. This investment is expected to prepare 50,000 people for careers in skilled trades through community college and community-based grants. Lowe's is backing community projects through their Hometowns initiative, providing funding and hands-on support for organizations to improve their facilities and services. One notable project, "Hello Park" in Tuskegee, Alabama, was proposed by Lionel Richie, who aims to create a vibrant outdoor space that honors the town's history. The company has partnered with Points of Light to support these projects, which can have a lasting impact on communities nationwide. Lowe’s is launching a program to support community improvement projects across the United States. The company has set aside $10 million for the initiative and will award 100 grants in June to help complete the projects. The program aims to build, repair, beautify, inspire, and improve 100 communities across America. Nominations are being accepted through April 19. According to Lowe’s president and CEO Marvin R. Ellison, serving the community has always been a core part of the company's culture and values. As they approach their centennial milestone, they want to commemorate this achievement by taking on 100 community improvement projects. The program will kick off in Chattanooga, Tennessee, with country music singer Kane Brown, who previously worked at Lowe’s. Kane Brown shared his excitement about giving back to his hometown, stating that the East Lake Boys & Girls Club is a special place that provides support and uplifts kids and families despite facing challenges during the pandemic. Nominations for 100 Hometowns can be submitted from March 9 to April 19 at midnight ET. Eligible project types include community spaces, neighborhood housing, cultural preservation, and area revitalization. Participants must be 18 years old or older and can nominate up to two unique projects each.
